

Editorial

It is a matter of great pleasure to publish the second edition of The Researcher, the annual journal publication of College of Applied Business and Technology. This journal is a humble effort for publishing scholarly articles and research works on diverse areas of management, economics, finance, human resources, social sciences etc. This issue consists of ten articles covering relevant and important studies on financial factors affecting FDI, CRS as an engine of entrepreneurship development, the origin and development of caste system in ancient Aryan society, caste hierarchy among Muslims, the moderating effects of family financial socialization, the determinants of agri-entrepreneurial performance, shifting cultivation practices, political and economic cooperation among SAARC countries etc.

The strength of the journal lies in properly communicating the results of research in the diverse fields of study covered by the different authors. The articles published herein not only reflect the systematic and thorough studies conducted by the authors in their respective field, but also are highly useful resources for observing and reflecting on the different issues of the research studies for the concerned interested scholars and readers.

As scholars continue rethinking what they would want to deliver through their research contributions, the question of how their articles can best meet the needs of particular spheres will keep coming up. We hope The Researcher will help in putting those questions in perspective. More importantly, we hope this journal will encourage readers to adopt new thoughts and ideas. While we admire the authors for their wonderful research efforts and contributions through the articles published herein, we neither approve nor disapprove any findings or observations made by the contributors. We highly welcome and are always open for constructive suggestions from the readers.
